international resource mobilization and to strengthening tax systems and transparency. A new global partnership should be built on North-South and South-South cooperation. Collaboration between the public and the private sectors was also essential and should enable technology transfer, equitable access to education and economic diversification. The sustainable development goals were closely interrelated and may thus be thought of as a single overarching goal, which would require collaborative efforts by all.

Mr. Löfven presented important elements of a global partnership. While official development assistance remained important, cooperation in investment and trade was also crucial. Exchanging ideas between science, business and society would ensure new solutions. Greening the global economy should include putting a high but fair price on carbon. He also called for a global deal on decent work for all, in which representatives of labour and management would reach agreements that would both respect the fundamental rights of labour and increase productivity. Mr. Löfven stressed the need for policy coherence, including between different sectorial policies. The new global partnership could not successfully treat problems in isolation as policy coherence was required for sustainable development and true justice.

Mr. Gurría pointed out that the members of the OECD Development Assistance Committee had increased their official development assistance to $135 billion despite the economic impact of the global financial crisis. A negative trend, which should be reversed, was that aid to least developed countries had decreased. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland had increased its official development assistance to 0.7 per cent of its gross national income while undergoing a strict adjustment programme. Other countries could also make the political effort shown by this example. Mr. Gurría pointed out that the Committee had developed a new measure called Total Official Support for Sustainable Development that meant to capture a broader concept of international cooperation than official development assistance. Mr. Gurría also described two initiatives led by OECD on taxation: (a) the Global Forum on Transparency and Exchange of Information for Tax Purposes, which assembles 127 countries in an effort to move toward automatic exchange of tax information; and (b) an initiative at the request of the Group of 20 to respond to aggressive tax planning schemes of some multinational enterprises. Tax Inspectors Without Borders, a joint initiative of OECD and the United Nations Development Programme that was being launched at the Conference, aimed to help developing countries in strengthening their tax administrations, in particular their audit capacity.

Ms. Tumusiime pointed out that poverty, hunger and disease remained the most pressing global problems. While remarkable progress had been made, not least through the Millennium Development Goals process, Africa fell short of meeting many goals. The new global partnership would need to be more comprehensive and focus on people and their wellbeing. Efforts should be made to give African boys and girls hope for the future. Ms. Tumusiime referred to the African Union's Agenda 2063, which embodied the continent's vision for an African continent that was integrated, peaceful, prosperous and people-centred. Ensuring global food security, mitigating the effects of climate change, addressing the infrastructure backlog and industrialization and ensuring a good energy mix would be important elements for sustainable development, and access to technology by all countries would be crucial in this process. Africa should focus on moving up the global value chain and ensuring intra-African trade for economic development. She stressed that adequate attention would have to be paid to women, including increasing their participation in the workforce. A global partnership should be built on mutual understanding and respect as well as appreciation for diversity.

Mr. Mohieldin intervened to stress the need for countries to evaluate the lessons learned from the Millennium Development Goals and to apply them going forward. In particular, he stressed that there was a need to monitor progress and to ensure the availability of relevant data. For example, he recalled that despite the focus on poverty reduction during the Millennium Development Goals era, only 57 countries had had data on the change in their level of poverty.

Mr. Mimica called for redefining the way the global community works together to ensure a better quality for all people. He stated that a comprehensive approach that made use of integrated financing mechanisms would be needed. He emphasized that the European Union was willing to aid countries in mobilizing domestic resources, including tackling tax evasion and avoidance and illicit traditional official development assistance should be maintained. Only a scaled-up global partnership could ensure meaningful development.

The following points were made during the discussion:

- Collective action, involving collaboration by States, international institutions, civil society organizations, citizens and the private sector in varying numbers, combinations and trajectories, would be required to realize the sustainable development goals and the post-2015 development agenda.
- Several participants noted that there were important potential benefits of international collaboration on tax matters including automatic exchange of taxpayer information. It was pointed out that 94 countries would begin to automatically exchange tax information in 2017 or 2018. It was also stressed that knowing the beneficial owner of an income stream was valuable to tax authorities.
- In addition, participants suggested that tax structures may need further reform, including to reduce the number of people in the informal economy. It was also noted that many developing countries were dependent on corporate taxations, but that corporations had been effective in extracting tax concessions from Governments.
- Several participants remarked that the OECD Global Forum implemented policies designed by the OECD Committee on Fiscal Affairs. In their view, developing countries should have a seat at the table where the norms were written. In this regard, they called for an upgrade of the United Nations Tax Committee to an intergovernmental body.
- It was also noted that one third of public investment was lost through inefficiencies. It was announced that the International Monetary Fund would launch a new tool for improving the efficiency of public spending.
- A further modality for collaboration included methods for using official development assistance catalytically to engage with private enterprises, civil private partnership unit should be established to oversee the negotiation and implementation of such partnerships.

- It was noted that there was also a need for broad oversight of partnerships, as specific initiatives may have impacts on the immediate partners and their clients. In that regard, participants stressed that coherence was an important policy concern that may be hard to manage but was necessary.
 - Participants also said that national sustainable development strategies could be an important basis for formulating appropriate policies and monitoring their implementation, for which appropriate data needed to be collected.
 - Different forms of finance may be considered, such as zakat (obligatory charitable contributions) and sharia-compliant Islamic finance, including for microenterprises.
 - Some participants suggested that migration should be included as an aspect of development policy, on the one hand to protect the rights of migrants and prevent their exploitation, and on the other hand to take proper account of their contribution to the development of their host countries.
