Madame Chair, Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

Austria fully aligns herself with the statement made by the distinguished representative of Denmark on behalf of the European Union. It is a privilege and honour for me to address the high-level plenary meeting of the 56th Committee of the Commission on the Status of Women.

In Austria, around 75% of the population live in rural areas. Examining the situation of women in rural areas is extremely important. When we talk about women in rural areas, we mean both women farmers and women living in the countryside. It is important to take into account their different needs and challenges.

While the focus in the mid-1900s was on giving the females of everyday life for women farmers, increasing attempts were made in the 1980s to reveal and change the disadvantaged position of women in the countryside. A shift towards gender equality in rural areas was then pursued by gender mainstreaming strategy from the mid-1990s onwards.

Women play an important role in agriculture and currently account for around 41% of agricultural and forestry workers.

The number of female-headed farms has increased significantly over the last ten years. Compared to other EU countries, Austria has a high percentage of agricultural businesses lead by women. An indicator therefore is the structure of female farmers. Foundation programmes in Austria which can help young women farmers to start their own business have been available since 2004.

On average, 38% of agricultural businesses are headed by women. However, the percentage decreases as the size of the business increases.

The participation of girls and women over 18 years in education is lower in rural regions than in urban areas. One of the main reasons for this is the lack of educational institutions in rural areas and limited job opportunities, low provision of childcare facilities and inadequate infrastructure are challenges for many women. Traditional attitudes, such as women being expected to bear sole responsibility for child care and the care of older relatives, still make life difficult for many women in the countryside.

But change can be achieved and must be started now in order to establish open

Decision-making structures in rural areas are often dominated exclusively by men.

Increasing female participation in rural decision-making bodies is of great importance here. This issue is addressed in the "equal opportunities" section of the Asian-Pacific Programme for the Development of Rural Areas.

While there are now significant improvements in terms of new legislation, there are still differences between urban and rural areas, particularly at the level and nature of education. The pay gap between women and men is being greater in rural regions than in urban areas.

For many women, especially young women, life in the countryside is becoming increasingly unattractive. Migration from rural to urban areas is often the final consequence. This is true most frequently among girls and women aged between 18 and 26.

Addressing the gender wage gap, such as the continuing pay gap, and to take into account the needs of women in rural areas, are two important

In Austria, the most recent amendment to the Equal Treatment Act, marketed as the "Equal Pay for Equal Work" package, creates salary transparency. German civil servants are now obliged to produce sex-disaggregated staff income reports. This has created a powerful instrument that enables action to be taken against discriminatory wage inequalities. The only countries in Europe to have established a legal basis for income transparency are Sweden and Austria.

Furthermore, job advertisements must now state the minimum wage and how much more the employer would be prepared to pay. Administrative penalties are being imposed for non-compliance. This is a necessary disincentive, another important step towards greater transparency.

Role models and stereotypes can prevent women and men from taking up their responsibilities in the public sector on 1 January 2011 which allows fathers of newborn children to take time off, is intended to motivate a greater number of fathers to take on more responsibility for child care. Ultimately, the reconciliation between work and private life is an issue that affects women and men alike.

Women's policy measures, such as improving the situation of women in rural areas require budgetary resources. A country's budget represents its policies in concrete figures. It reveals how much importance is accorded to equality in a society by giving the gender perspective at all levels of budget planning and monitoring. This needs to be a matter of concern to us all. In Austria, gender budgeting was enshrined in the constitution on 1 January 2009. From 2013 onwards, the Federal Budget Law requires each federal ministry to determine gender equality measures. As a next step, concrete measures and indicators in order to realize the respective gender equality outcome have to be defined. This opens up major opportunities for the implementation of gender budgeting and thus for gender equality policy in Austria.

Madame Chair, I would finally like to briefly introduce the latest news about our current efforts in Austria to implement the Security Council Resolution 1325 (2000) on peace and security. Back in 2007, Austria was one of the first countries worldwide to adopt a National Action Plan, and implementing this plan has been a resolution. Austria marked the tenth anniversary last year of the UN Security Council Resolution 1325 with a comprehensive revision of this Action Plan. The revised Action Plan was adopted by the Austrian federal government in July 2011.²³ The key goals of the new Action Plan are to increase the participation of women in peace-support and conflict-resolution measures; to prevent violence against women and girls; and to increase the representation of women in international peace operations as well as in decision-making positions in international and European organizations. The revised National Action Plan takes into account the indicators developed by the United Nations and the European Union in recent years, which will enable the progress made in implementing Resolution 1325 to be measured more effectively in the future. The implementation of the National Action Plan will continue to be assessed annually by an interministerial working group with a view to further improvements in the future.

the Executive Chair, in concluding his work, his opportunity to express our recognition of the success of the meeting. In this year for instance, in particular the key institutional foundations were laid. We are looking forward to continuing our collaboration and will do our utmost to support UN Women in carrying out its important work in implementing the four pillars of the UN Women's programme

Madame Chair, the concerns and needs of women in rural areas need to be the subject of greater particularity. We are confident that this year's CSW session will make a significant contribution in this area.
