Madam Chairperson

In 2008, the United Nations chose October 15 to be the "International Day for Rural Women" in recognition of the contributions of rural women throughout the world. As they represented more than a quarter of the world population, rural women are the main force in the development of agriculture, improvement of food security and poverty eradication, as well as in many of the rural activities, diversification of family incomes and care of children and the elderly. Studies have shown that if rural women are given equal access to productive resources as men, the world's agriculture output could increase 39-50% and the poverty rate could fall by 17%, and quality of life of more than 150 million people living in poverty could be improved. Despite their tremendous potential, rural women have always been undervalued and often completely ignored. Too little have been done to fully recognize their role, legally, economically, technologically and in statistics. It is time for the international community to invest in rural women and create an enabling environment for rural women to utilize their full potential in contributing to the growth and socio-economic development and support their equal participation in decision-making.

Madam Chairperson

In Viet Nam, women are a major and crucial force in the process of rural modernization and industrialization. According to the National Demographic Survey, women accounted for 50.5% of the total workforce in agriculture. Among the female workforce, 68% is in agriculture while this number in male is 53%. Women's role in agricultural production has become more and more important in economic transformation, as participation is continually increasing, more compared to the participation of men. Women are also actively participating in administrative as well as mass organizations, greatly contributing to the rural and agricultural development in Viet Nam.

In recent years, Vietnamese Government has made numerous efforts to improve the framework of policies and legislations on gender equality, as well as to promote the implementation of social security policies in order to contribute to the stability and development of the country. Together with the implementation of Gender Equality Law, the Prime Minister has approved National Strategy on Gender Equality for the period 2011-2020 and National Program on Gender Equality for the period 2011-2015. These documents propose specific measures, targets and projects to strengthen the access to socioeconomic and labor opportunities for women in rural areas and ethnic minority women. The Prime Minister also approved Project on Vocational Training for Rural Laborers by mid year 2020 which focus on vocational training for women by relevant agencies, and create favorable conditions for women to access employment opportunities and increase their income.

Access to credit has also been improved for rural women, particularly women in need and in remote areas. By 2010, the rate of poor households headed by women got a credit from the Viet Nam Social Policy Fund reached 82.72% of the total number of households that received credit loans. Models such as Club of well-doing business women, Club of female entrepreneurs, etc. have been successful and implemented throughout the communes, wards and villages. As a result, for the period of 2006-2010, more than 800 thousand households had come out of poverty, more than 50% of which was headed by women. In addition, more attention has been paid to education, training and capacity building for rural women and girls. The literacy gap between rural and urban areas is still at 62% and 97% respectively. The revised Law on Land and 2002 Labor Code created a legal framework for women to have rights in owning and running businesses.

Madam Chairperson,

With strong political commitments, the Government of Viet Nam has been vigorously engaged in a range of activities to improve the situation of rural women and has gained encouraging achievements not only in Viet Nam but in many other countries. Vietnamese rural women have been at a disadvantage compared to men, as well as to urban women with regards to opportunities for education, employment, information access and so on. However, there are still many challenges against rural women have been raised in Viet Nam, especially regarding the participation of communal affairs and decision-making positions.

In the coming time, the Vietnamese Government is determined to promote the implementation of Gender Equality laws as well as national strategy on Gender Equality in the period of 2011-2020: striving to improve the education rights of women and girls in all fields, including education and training, labor and employment and science, technology.

On the behalf of the Vietnamese Governmental delegation, I would like to express our commitments to fully cooperation with the United Nations system and other Member States in further developing gender-responsive systems and policies to achieve the objectives set out in this session.

Thank you. /.
